

ISO 22000 – Food Safety Management System Certification

Overview

Time and again, consumers may feel insecure because of quality problems in the food industry. Food safety is more important than ever and has absolute priority for all the links in the food distribution chain. The aim is to ensure that consumers in globalized markets can be supplied with safe products over the entire food chain by means of standardization.

The ISO 22000 standard was developed by the ISO Technical Committee with representation from international experts within the food industry.

Following the philosophy of “from field to plate”, the scope of ISO 22000 not only covers all the links within the actual food chain, but also companies from upstream and downstream sectors.

These include among others:

- Food Manufacturers
- Animal Feed Manufacturers
- Primary Production (From Animals and Plants)
- Transport, Storage
- Wholesalers and Retailers
- Packaging, cleaning agent and additive Industry

As all the stages of the food chain are covered, this standard achieves harmonisation which meets the interests of all the individuals concerned.

As this standard was developed on the international level, the corresponding certificates are recognized worldwide. Other special benefits include the systematic integration of HACCP (Hazard Analysis and Critical Control Points) and continuous improvement of the food safety system.

ISO 22000 emphasizes on basic pre-requisite programmes.
